I think violent games and movies are good for a person to experience. Gaming lets you travel to another reality where their actions don't have real consequences, these gaming experiences could help in the real world when they have a difficult decision in front of them. Movies help a person understand the consequences of their actions, when someone watches a movie, they hope the good guys win, they get a sense of what happens if you are a bad person or a criminal. This is an example of how violent content don't make people violent but the people around them. And you don't let a three-year-old play a horror game or watch a movie with gore, that's called common sense, no matter what you say these movies and games that are violent are inspired by real things. There have been countless researchers concluding that violent games and movies don't make people violent

Sometimes violence in films or the media can have more than a negative impact on children, maybe even a positive impact. It can give children a better understanding of the world.

The world is not a field of flowers and rainbows, which we grow up thinking. Therefore, maybe watching some violence might be good, and the children could get a better and more realistic view of the world. I think it can help with preparing, for what might come in adult life.

I agree with what the teens are saying, and if addressed by the parents there is nothing wrong with watching violence.

There are multiple films with violence, like war movies. Violence in war movies, helps us understand and respect what the soldiers had to go thru under war. And in those cases, I mean that it is necessary for understanding. So, in some cases it is important to show violence, as it helps us to understand
